IDENTITY AND MUSIC IN SINGAPORE

Mrs Joanne Yeo
Programme Manager
(Music)

How do we define Singaporean music or music in Singapore? Do Singaporean music and music in Singapore mean the same thing?

As a young nation turning 49 this year, as a multi-cultural nation and a global city, how do we define our music and what do we define to be our music?

Yet despite our relative youth, has the definition of music in Singapore or Singaporean music remained static? Does it continue to evolve? What music will live on into our future history? Should we preserve music traditions in Singapore or encourage its evolution and growth?

As much as our society is an exciting melting-pot of cultures, there is complexity and diversity of identities when we discuss music in Singapore. There is individual identity, cultural identity, community identity, national identity, the list goes on; yet an individual's identity is influenced by his community, his nation and the larger world. So it is with music and Identity in Singapore. Can we clearly define what is our music? Do we have to define what is our music? Can we even call it our music?

As a Singapore music educator, I often ponder over the questions surrounding music and Identity. In my view, there is no one single-dimensional answer to these questions but I am clear about one thing – that it is crucial for my students to explore and build understanding of music in the Singapore context. And perhaps as global citizens in the 21st century, what we need to bring to our students in the music classroom isn't clear definitions but expansion of their perspectives. Divergence rather than convergence can be healthy.

We believe that a distinctive Singapore voice resides in the living legends of music practitioners today. STAR has engendered the start of an exciting teacher resource, designed for our Singapore music teachers to deepen their approach to teaching Singapore music. This applied learning resource is targeted for the general music classroom teacher.

Starting 2013, STAR Music Master Teachers (MTTs) and Music Programme Managers (PMs) have been conducting field work research into the living music traditions in Singapore.

We have been learning at workshops and dialogue sessions with various arts practitioners, conducting interviews with pioneers in various music genres, designing and trialling lessons with colleagues at the Arts Education Branch (AEB) and our STAR Associate teachers, and been in conversation with our partners at the National Library Board (NLB) and the National Arts Council (NAC). These have guided STAR's design of a unique professional development curriculum for teaching living music traditions in Singapore and to support schools in the implementation of the revised syllabus for General Music from 2015.

Our curriculum, entitled Teaching Living Legends, distinctively develops participants in their music practice, pedagogy and perspective.

Catch our July launching teaching seminar: the music content will include Dikir Barat, Indian Orchestra, Malay Rhythms, the National Anthem and Singapore Songs, Singapore Composers and Xinyao. To further support our teachers in applying their learning, a pedagogical resource kit will also be made available to participants at the seminar, rich with pedagogical ideas and multimedia resources.

We welcome our fraternity of music teachers to explore the diversity and complexity of perspectives surrounding Identity and music in Singapore. The STAR milestone programme Teaching Living Legends will be held on 2-4 and 8-9 July 2014. Application and course details will be sent through Vice-Principals and School Staff Developers in mid-April. See you there!

SEEDING IN SILENCE

Kelly Tang, PhD,
Dean, Arts
School Of The Arts,
Singapore

Our guest writer for this issue is Dr Kelly Tang, Dean of Arts at the School of the Arts (SOTA) Singapore, local composer and Cultural Medallion holder. Here, he shares his views on Singaporean music.

Any discussion of “the music of Singapore” draws at once a bewildering crossfire of sharply contrasting and paradoxical responses. But to me, there is no place more fertile, inspiring and exciting to compose music than Singapore.

Perhaps the place where we grow up resonates richly with who we are, so we can flow naturally with its rhythm and draw abundantly from the intrinsic life, character and energy of its culture. While some cultures rest luxuriantly upon rich and long-standing musical traditions, we peer at Singapore’s musical origins and there seems only to be a silent void.

But to the fertile imagination, empty space becomes a powerful vacuum that calls forth artistic innovation. Being suspended in such a space engenders a heightened sense of artistic dynamism and agility. With no rigid framework to rein us in, it leaves only the impetus to push forward always to discover fresh directions. From Singapore’s dynamic confluence of cultures emerges a lively musical interplay that is never cast in stone or locked in fixed patterns. It becomes a wellspring of infinite creative possibility. Starting from nothing provides capacity to aspire to everything.

Artistry is never about being better than someone else. It is about the journey to find ourselves. Playing desperate games of catch up with others never works, because that would be playing their game, not ours.

So where is Singaporean music really at? It is where we are at: both you and I. Only when we search deep within ourselves can we find music that says something important to the world.

WHAT'S ON AT STAR

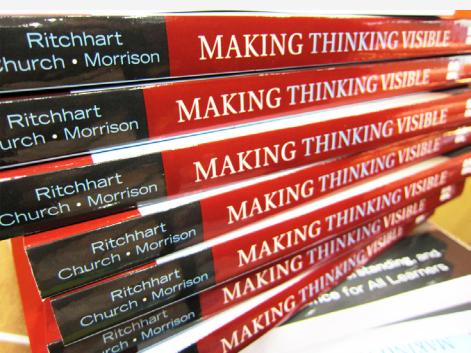

Making Thinking Visible In Music Learning

As educators, how often do we find ourselves wishing we could know what is going on in our learners' minds? Our Primary STAR Champions returned to the Academy for conversations on student-centric music lessons in March. The main focus was the role of formative assessment in facilitating student learning. In tandem, our STAR Champions explored the use of visible thinking routines as presented in Making Thinking Visible by Ritchhart, Church and Morrison¹. The exploration and learning will continue as they uncover their students' learning back in school and guide their cluster teachers in doing the same.

Look out for your cluster STAR Champions for the primary level:

WHAT'S ON AT STAR

A Reflective Culture In Teacher-Leadership

A fresh Class of 2014 Art and Music Senior Teachers (STs) embarked on their journey of professional renewal in this year's STAR Senior Teacher Programme. STAR collaborates with the Victoria Institute, led by Professor Roger Slee, Claire Brown and Micheál McCarthy. Together with staff at STAR, the many conversations on curriculum, pedagogy, teacher-leadership and mentorship engendered deep reflection about teacher agency in our STs. We wish them a deeper understanding as they continue with their study trip, industry attachment and curriculum project assignments to make thinking visible in the arts classroom. We are in for exciting times!
